HISTORY

After the American Revolution, cities began to increase. The intense use of land in cities created new investment opportunities. Real estate was an alternative investment of surplus funds; however, investors weren't always proficient in managing real estate property because it was not their primary business and it was often considered a burden.

As cities continued to grow in response to the Industrial Revolution, the demand for commercial and residential property increased. This required special skills in leasing and full-time staff to serve the building and its tenants.

For this reason, Property Owners and Landlords, should consider a Property Management Company with a strong ethical background as their managing agent. Society continuously expands and changes, the right Property Management Company will respond to a diversity of problems to either capitalize on or minimize the effects of changes, depending on the projected outcome.

Although the property management profession has grown exponentially since the early 1930's, it is still a personal-service profession. Because of the individual relationships they have with both building owners and tenants, conscientious property managers are aware of the ongoing need for self-improvement and adherence to a strict code of ethics. The quality of Management adds to the value of its space.
